could he?

My tribute to the minister seemed to impress them and to raise me in their esteem; it was to my credit to appreciate Elias Peabody and I was not offended at the prestige that came to me from the lustre borrowed of him. We broke camp quickly and started on the long trail through the mountains, in warlike panoply but with little thought of things warlike in our hearts. "It's our friend, Mr. Bucks, late mem-ber of the Legislature," said Harrison. But Harrison came to me ten minutes later and said that Mr. Bucks insisted on seeing me on business of importance. Everything was packed and we were just about to start, but I told Harrison to bring the man. I was standing by a great tree when he came. I noticed at once that his swarthy face was flushed and he was clinching and unclinching his hands, both signs of anger. I resolved at 1.om him. "Governor," he exclaimed, "what is the meaning of this?" "Of what?" I asked in the dryest tone I could command. "Of these troops, armed men march-

"Well," I replied in the same tone, 'I'm the Governor of this State, and this little army is here for reasons sufficient to me. It is not necessary to explain them to you." The crimson blood burned through his darkface, and his eyes flamed with the headlong anger of the tribesman.

"But these are peaceful counties!" he exclaimed, "you have no right to come here with troops." "They don't seem to be very peaceful," I said, "when a half dozen men have been murdered; and I have an bsolute right to come here. Moreover I intend to put these counties under martial law." He burst into imprecations and ordered his arrest at once-it was a thing that I was loth to do, owing to my former personal difficulty in the beginning. Under my orders Applesate and two men seized him and searched him-they found on his person a revolver and a knife, both of which were confiscated. "You have forced this action, Mr.

Bucks," I said, "I have heard that you are one of the Horner clansmen and we have certainly found evidence her that you go prepared to do violence. You will be under arrest as long as

There was, too, a certain grim but not unpleasant irony in the reflection that Bucks had ridden straight into a trap, and then had closed the trap with his own hand.

"You are to keep him under strict guard," I said to Applegate, "I make him your personal charge, but you are not to treat him with any discourtesy unless he compels it."

Then we resumed the march, but I kept away from Bucks. I did not wish to appear as one who, taking advantage of his power, exulted over an enemy.

He would not dream that the Governor the mountains, gazing at us in solemn of Kentucky, coming at the head of his silence as we went into camp just on little army, was Charlie Johnson who had been a convict with him. How swart and sullen, was still with us he had no other choice-and he was "Mr. Peabody is doing a good work," I said to the mountaineers. "Now that you give his name I recall it, and I know that he is an honest and able as acting on information." the march I arrested within two hours of our arirval three other men who were leaders in the feud. They were taken wholly by surprise and made no resistance. When this was done I walked down toward the town with some of the officers, Harrison and Connor among them.
